Proposed Title:

Machine Learning Models to Analyze the Effect of Drugs on Neonatal

Problem Statement:

Newborns are very sensitive to drug therapy due to their underdeveloped organs and metabolic systems. However, clinical data on drug efficacy in neonates is limited, and unwanted drug reactions often respond. Traditional methods for assessing the security and effectiveness of medicines are slowly and insufficient when recognizing complex patterns. A data-control approach is needed to predict and analyze the potential risks and outcomes of neonatal drug transfer.

Motivation of the Work:

Machine learning provides powerful devices for uncovering hidden patterns and predicting drug effects more accurately and more efficiently. This study is motivated by the need to improve neonatal care, reduce drug-related complications, and support clinical decisions through intelligent data control models. By using machine learning, we hope to contribute to safe and effective treatment strategies for endangered neonatal patients.
